Assets

“The role of assets, and the history of asset ownership in Native communities, is different from any other low-income community. Native American tribes and individuals technically own many assets, including land, but often do not control these assets and thus do not reap the benefits. Asset-building policy in Native communities thus must have a dual focus: assisting tribal nations in controlling and building their assets, and assisting tribal members with individual asset building to support their families and communities” Rebecca Adamson, Founder, First Nations Development Institute

Traditionally and historically our people have had a holistic view of assets. We have always valued family, tradition, land and so forth as resources of value. These resources are value based but not necessarily based on financial gain. An asset is any item owned by you that has value and has lasting value, for example; land, a car, a house, or a savings account.

In the Northern Cheyenne Resource Directory you shall find a variety of organizations, programs and churches that will assist our people in finding additional resources that help them build assets. They provide financial education, credit counseling, home buyer education and or energy assistance that will help our community members to the next level by empowering them to set and reach their goals.

Chief Dull Knife College Extension Service program and People’s Partner for Community Development would like to thank all those individuals and programs that are committed to making our people reach economic viability. Special recognition is given to Patsy Schramn, Roberta Harris, Christina Barsky and First Nations for their support in this project.
